

some red on the side next the sun, having a considerable portion of russett brown around the eye, and in streaks and patches over the whole surface. The flesh is greenish, or very little inclining to yellow when fully ripe; of rather firm consistence, but of pleasant flavour, and extraordinary richness. Ripens in January, but becomes improved if carefully kept until February. It is justly regarded as one of the best dessert apples at present known.

Our Specimen was obtained from Mr. KIRKE, in the autumn of 1814.
